In the long course of time, plants and animals have made themselves at home in different regions of the earth. Living things are well adapted for life in their habitats. The land habitat is best known to us because it is the one in A_____. Most centers of human population are in places with moderate annual rainfall where variations in temperature are not extreme. We ourselves are reasonably well adapted to such habitats; if not, we would not survive. A great variety of plants and animals are also adapted to life on the land. However, not all land habitats are alike by any means. Some of them present extreme conditions B_____. The desert, for example, is a dry habitat in C_____. Camels, however, are well suited to life in a dry country; so much so, indeed, that they are called "ships of the desert". They have pad like feet D _____. Special stomach pouches, which are closed by ringside muscles, store reserve supplies of water. A camel can live without drinking for several days, drawing upon its reserve store of liquid while it makes its way over the desert between two oases. A camel may be required to go without food for a time, E _____. The animal is also equipped to meet an emergency of this kind. One species, the dromedary of Arabia, has a hump on its back F _____. The Bactrian camel of central Asia has two humps of fat-storing cells. No wonder that the camel has always been used by man for carrying burdens across central Asia and northern Africa, particularly the Sahara Desert.

1. that can be met only by unusual adaptations
2. which are very effective in walking upon desert sands
3. which only a few of our more familiar plants and animals can live
4. because vegetation in a desert is likely to be inadequate
5. which we normally spend our own lives
6. because it can go for days without food or water
7. that can hold a reserve food supply of stored fat

Changing Yourself Researchers from Oxford University claim that training young people to look at social situations positively could help teenagers with anxiety and A_____ may help problems in their adult lives. The researchers found that tasks designed to prompt either positive or negative interpretations of unclear situations can change how healthy teenagers think about such events. Having shown in the laboratory that positive or negative styles of thinking can be caused in teenagers without any anxiety problems, the team now wants to see if it is possible to change the negative thoughts that can B _____ to serious illnesses in teenagers with high anxiety. The same C_____ is used by the researchers at the Institute of Psychiatry. "It's thought that some people may tend to D_____ conclusions in unclear situations," explains Dr Jennifer Lau who E_____ the experiments at the Department of Experimental Psychology at Oxford University. "For example, I might wave at someone on the other side of the street. If they don't wave back, I might think they don't remember me - or alternatively, I might think they're ignoring me. People with anxiety are more likely to interpret the situation in the second way. These negative thoughts F _____ their feelings of low mood and anxiety. If you can change that negative style of thinking, perhaps you can change mood in anxious teenagers." Youth is a period when problems with anxiety and depression can first appear, and we need new treatments to deal with them. Cognitive behaviour therapy may be an option, but it doesn't work for everyone and it may not be G _____ everywhere, so research is needed here.
